Consider fading FX risk premium selectively

Global markets appear to be stabilizing following the post-"Liberation Day" shock. VIX has declined from an intraday peak of 60 on April 7 to 30. CVIX for the FX market also appears to have plateaued (Exhibit 1). At the current juncture, we believe FX investors could consider selectively fading some of the still-elevated front-end FX risk premiums. The US administration has stated reciprocal tariffs rates announced on April 2 were "the high end of the number", and a 90-day pause has also been implemented. Ongoing US tariffs headlines could still keep vols supported for USD-pairs, as the DXY vs CVIX spot-to-vol correlation has turned negative. On the G10 crosses, while EURGBP and AUDNZD do not have the highest level of implied vols, they stand out in that the 3m implied vols are now at a premium over the 3m realized vols (Exhibit 2).

Fade elevated EURGBP vol and skew

EURGBP sharply rallied from an 0.83-handle to 0.87 on the back of broad-based cyclical deleveraging (see FX Watch, 08 April 2025). Traditional GBP anchors remain unimpaired, and the GBP selloff occurred in the absence of fundamentally negative UK economic developments. Our forecast has EURGBP at 0.82 for Q2 2025. In the absence of further broad-based global tariffs escalation between now and the end of the 90-day reciprocal tariffs pause, we would expect EURGBP to slowly grind lower toward the 200d SMA at 0.8382. Given the still-elevated 3m EURGBP vol vs recent history and risk reversal at close to +1 vol for EUR call (Exhibit 3), we see a 3m seagull structure of long 3m 0.8450/0.83 put spread and short 3m 0.87 call as attractive. The structure initially receives premium and has negative delta and vega. The short call strike is at the peak EURGBP spot level during the post-Liberation Day shock. For investors who do not want unlimited downside risk with the short call, a simpler put spread structure could also be used. The risk would be a resurgence of global tariffs tension between now and the end of the 90-day reciprocal tariffs pause.

3m 1.06-strike AUDNZD put is 30-delta vs 2% occurrence

For AUD/NZD, we like to fade risk premiums for OTM puts below a 1.06-strike. At the 3m tenor, FX vol market currently assigns around 30% delta to a 1.06-strike AUD/NZD put. Since the pair crossed above 1.06 at the end of 2021, it has traded below 1.06 less than 2% of the time (Exhibit 4). Any dip below 1.06 has quickly returned above this support level on average by 1.25 business days. Our forecast still has AUD/NZD spot at above 1.10 this year. Escalation of the trade tension between US and China has been more negative for AUD than NZD, to a great extent due to existing long AUD vs short NZD positioning (see FX Watch: Anatomy of an AUD sell-off 08 April 2025). However, China has stated it would no longer raise retaliatory tariffs beyond 125% on the US. In recent days, it also laid out the conditions to open talks with the US. These ongoing macroeconomic developments should keep AUD/NZD supported, in our view. Risk for AUD/NZD put sellers would be a further escalation of US and China tariffs war.
