Oct FX rebalancing – marginal GBP outflows vs JPY inflows

Estimates: into JPY vs marginally out of GBP

We estimate FX rebalancing needs based on a conventional 60/40 portfolio of global equities and bonds (see methodology below). Our estimates reflect underperformance of JPY relative to other currencies denominated assets over Oct (see Exhibit 1). While Japanese Nikkei has sharply rallied this month on new Japanese Prime Minister, it was not enough to offset the JPY depreciation and marginal JGB selloff for global investors. Overall Chinese equity performance is weighed down by the stocks listed on the Hang Seng index, despite the Shanghai composite index inching close to 4000 level. UK assets are unfazed ahead of the UK budget event risk in November. This implies scope for marginal rebalancing flows out of GBP (c.-0.6 σ – see Exhibit 2), EM and to an even lesser extent USD, inflows into JPY (c.+1.0 σ) and EUR.

CHF: Equity outperformance = Buy CHF signal.

In this section we look specifically at potential rebalancing flows in USD/CHF and EUR/CHF, as CHF exposures are not included in our macro portfolio approach above. Another strong performance in US equities and positive bond returns suggests a bias to sell USD into month-end. We are nonetheless cognizant that flows may be amplified by ongoing derisking by Swiss investors as well as addition of hedges over and above what is required for rebalancing.

We think that this trend is continuing and may provide a headwind to the usual rules of rebalancing. Overlaying this with recent tariff news and the direction of flow is likely to be less certain than it has been in recent months. October is likely to have been dominated by rebalancing on equity market performance rather than fixed income. This would suggest USD/CHF selling in month end. Having said this, the 3.5% rally in the SPX in September did not lead to month-end USD/CHF selling which has occurred in 3 of the last 5 months.

Timing these flows is not an exact science. We looked at CHF price action from T-3 to T+1 to cover a range of possibilities. Taking the cumulative sum of daily returns smooths out some of the daily volatility, and our analysis shows a strong correlation when equity returns are $>$ or $<$ 2%. Daily returns analysis also reveals that the bulk of month-end activity occurs on T- 0 and T+1. The average T-3 fall in USD/CHF when SPX has $<$ 2% and CHF buying has occurred is 1%. We would expect this to be the max fall at month-end.

USD/CHF selling has been the dominant flow in recent years and has been correlated well to equity market performance when the S&P has large up months ($>$ 2%).

Caveat to the framework

We note that (1) the magnitude of rebalancing for an asset is proportional to the significance of the underlying trend and (2) while rebalancing flows work against these trends in the last sessions of the month or quarter, one should not expect these to be a material catalyst for the reversal of the underlying trend, as these broader trends are generally driven by macro drivers. At most, therefore, one should expect some deficit in the last sessions of the month or quarter relative to the underlying trend.

Methodology

We estimate FX rebalancing needs based on a conventional 60/40 portfolio of global equities and bonds (see the report, Estimating FX rebalancing needs, from 8 April 2024). This framework is a simpler version of the one used to estimate pension fund rebalancing flows.

The allocations for each of the assets in the equity and bond sectors of the global portfolio reflect the weight of the asset as a fraction of the broader market equity and bond markets. These weights are obtained from external sources (e.g., SIFMA and ICMA) and to a broad extent reflect the relative liquidity of each asset. We anticipate revising these weights on a yearly frequency. Outside of these revisions, these weights are left static, and the underlying assumption used to calculate FX rebalancing needs is that the aggregate global portfolio rebalances monthly or quarterly back to these weights.

We track the performance of each asset with a corresponding unhedged total return benchmark. At month- and quarter-end, portfolios are expected to rebalance out of overperforming assets and into underperforming assets. In our framework, we calculate the rebalancing needs in both relative terms (%) and in Z-Score form (using the last 3 years of data).
