ECB Review: whatever it takes to stop cutting rates

ECB wants to stop

The ECB really want to stop after this week's cut. While the guidance in the written statement still emphasizes meeting-by-meeting and data-dependence, Lagarde during the press conference made an effort to implicitly signal that, unless data surprises them to the downside, policy rates are in a good place. We end up not far from where we were before, meaning we always worked on the assumption that data would need to push the ECB to go lower from here.

But that extra resistance we saw today probably means the bar (in terms of surprises) is higher than we thought and, probably, further moves are only likely in meetings with new forecasts. Hence, we no longer expect the ECB to cut policy rates in July, but we still expect them to do so in September and December. Our terminal call hence moves to 1.5%, from 1.25%.

Hoping for the best, not really preparing for the worst

The ECB is fully forward-looking, or at least it would seem so given the insistence from Lagarde on ignoring the inflation undershoot in 2026 headline given that 2027 goes back to 2% (but not core, stuck slightly below 2%). And this is despite those forecasts being a bit of a best-case scenario, where the German fiscal package has a strong impact and tariffs do not get worse from here (that could be wrong very soon given pending 232 investigations).

Additionally, that 2027 2% is quite mechanical since "the increase in headline inflation to 2.0% in 2027 relates to a temporary upward impact from energy inflation, reflecting climate change transition-related fiscal measures, in particular the introduction of a new Emissions Trading System (ETS2)." And that 2% in 2027 includes one more cut from here based on market pricing at the cut-off date.

Once again, the perception this week was that inflation has to be 2%, even if everything would suggest it could fall short of this (Exhibit 1). It won't, and that will become evident soon given how sticky core inflation forecasts are for 2Q and somewhat also for 3Q.

The risk: back to the 2010s

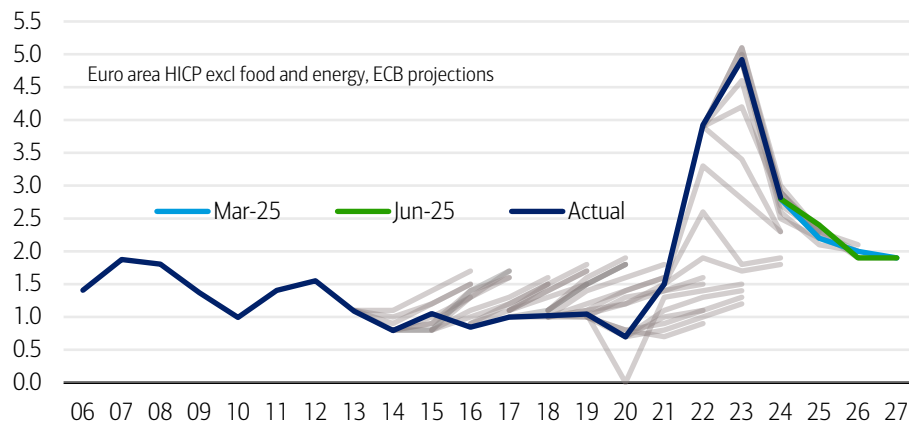

We worry. Just a few weeks ago we argued that the ECB would not tolerate a persistent inflation undershoot since that would be equivalent to implicitly acknowledging that the old asymmetry (close to but below 2%) is still there. It proved costly before, and it could prove costly again. This is a key reason why we still think the ECB will end up continuing to take policy rates lower in 2H. But this week's meeting leaves us a little more worried about that.

ECB forecast: giving its all to stay at 2%

This was a complex and uncertain forecast round. According to the full forecast report, the central bank's staff: 1) assumed tariffs stay at today's levels, 2) assumed no retaliation from the EU and 3) incorporated the German fiscal package. Growth forecasts were more or less unchanged (unch. 2025, -10bp in 2026, unch. 2027), HICP was cut in 2025/16 (-30bp, close to our expectations), but 2027 remained at 2.0%. Core forecasts showed a mild but persistent undershoot (1.9% in 2026/27, close to our expectations), but Lagarde discounted the relevance of that in the press conference.

We find a bit odd that growth remained at 1.3% in 2027, despite the inclusion of Germany's fiscal plans – this would suggest the fiscal boost would just compensate for the FX move. And, at the same time, inflation accelerates back to 2.0% in 2027 – as the forecast details clarify, this relies significantly on the upward impact from climate change transition-related measures (ie the Emission Trading System).

Rates strategy: hawkish ECB => higher rates, flatter curve, but moves could have been larger

The market was quick to interpret the ECB press conference as hawkish, with president Lagarde addressing the question of a potential pause in July by stating that the central bank was now in a good place, with inflation forecasts settling well at target.

Overall, forwards moved from pricing in 6.5bp of cuts for the July meeting, to only 3bp (<15% probability of a 25bp cut). The implied terminal €str rate rose by 9bp, to 1.66%.

Moves could have been arguably larger, as we are still implying a full 25bp cut by year-end. Like us, market participants are probably acknowledging that the tariff risks and uncertainty ahead, in the context of rapidly falling inflation, can end up pushing the ECB to deliver more. That said, until those risks prove significant, the front-end may remain under bearish pressure, causing some flattening pressure also for the curve.

On the curve, we would also note that the flattening today was more significant in German bonds than in swaps. We believe this divergence can extend, with more flattening pressure in bond space – recall that, in our analysis, the German curve appeared too steep compared to what global bond curve dynamics would have implied.

For country spreads to Bunds, today's ECB messaging could reduce the appetite for carry that we observed since March, reducing the potential for continued strong resilience in periphery spreads to the broader risk backdrop.

EUR: a hawkish meeting

With President Lagarde becoming open to a “pause”, the June ECB meeting was hawkish and certainly more eventful for FX than we expected.

We remain bullish on the EUR on (see also EUR: tariffs, arms, and Real Money 5 Jun '25):

1. Fiscal – we continue to think the FX market has not fully appreciated the fiscal shift underway in Germany and, to some extent, in Europe. June remains a key month.
2. Flows/positioning – our FX flows suggest ample space among Real Money investors for USD to sell off further including vs. EUR. Strong EUR demand from European Real Money has stood out in our flows, in line with equity flows data. Even if asset rotation stops, European asset managers likely have space to adjust up their hedging ratios. EUR can also find support from Officials if they rebalance more slowly, and corporates if they too hedge more.
3. Tariffs – in our view, they are bad for Europe but worse for the US. As far the ECB is concerned, its ability to add stimulus if needed is in contrast with the Fed's likely tied hands and, therefore, a plus for the EUR.
